

seem that his superstardom become a temporary interference, because when you have literally millions of fans all over the world buying everything from concert tickets to T-shirts; when you sell out the largest concert halls in America and Europe; when your earnings are measured in the millions; when you don't venture out of your home. except with body guards; when your entire world ceases to be private — it is difficult to maintain a perspective on who you really are.