

Could they be relatively new to that part of his head? Mmm. I'm wondering if the American star has had a little HT work done.

Does David Cassidy have David Cassidy hair these days? And I make a mental note to steer that into the conversation the next time I interview him. But at the same time I'm laughing gently at the notion that perhaps even the Hairgods aren't any more immune to hair loss than the rest of us.

And now Vinnie is catching the grin on my face, seeing me smiling, no doubt thinking the delight has come from looking at myself in the mirror for three minutes.

No matter.

He's now taking his clippers to the sides. Gently. And he's good. I don't feel a thing. And at the back where the scar was a little more sensitive he uses his scissors to get the longer hair as short as possible and closer to the length on top. And it works. It looks a whole lot better.

Sorted. For a tenner. Brilliant.

Three hours later however and settling for a night in watching TV I feel some discomfort, and not just because I've had to miss out on my mighty Saturday afternoon tennis match with my pal Stephen. (Rule 5 of the Post-Op Instructions said; No strenuous physical activity for one week after surgery; e.g., sex, jogging, sport, gym.)

No, it's awkward to lean my head back in the sofa and relax because after ten minutes pressure or so the back of my head feels a little tender, or itchy. But, overall, it's nothing to bother about. And sleep comes easily, thanks to taking a Cocodamol before dropping off.

IT'S now Sunday. And feeling fine I decide to fly in the
