DAVID CASSIDY—ALONE continued from page 6

like big parties or discotheques, so you suggest starting your date with a quiet dinner at a quaint little seafood restaurant along the coast. You both order lobster—David's favorite food—and the evening's off to a great start.

David may tell you a funny story about his wire-haired terrier, Sam, to break the ice and get the conversation rolling. Then you learn that he's really rather shocked by his sudden popularity and that's why he appeared so shy at first. But he loves to talk... and he does. And he makes you hold up your end of the conversation, too. You realize that it's much more important to David to know what's going on inside a girl's head than what's going on outside of it. What a girl looks like is of no great concern to him as long as she can be honest, sincere and show a little intelligence and wit.

After you've eaten, you go for a moonlight walk along the beach. David may go on to tell you about his new series, "The Partridge Family," but he usually doesn't like to talk shop-talk on a date. He'll probably want to talk about things you have in common—books you've read, movies you've seen, music you like. The he tells you about his especially favorite things—tennis, swimming, playing guitar, New York City—and then ask you about yours. You find that David wants to talk with you—not at you—and learn about you as the conversation progresses.

You may ask him about the future and his plans and he's glad to tell you. Though he loves music and acting, he says he'd like to try his luck at directing someday. As far as marriage goes—he won't worry about that until he's thirty years old. Then he adds—with a gleam in his eye and a soft smile on his lips—"That is, unless I happen to meet the right girl before!"

You walk and talk for a long, long time... sharing ideas and secrets. David's so easy to talk with and so much fun to be with! In fact, everything's been so great, you wish your evening with David could go on forever. But it can't, of course.

You drive slowly back home and when you reach your house, David looks at you and takes your hand. "Hey, you know, football season's just beginning. Did I tell you I really dig watching football games? How about coming with me to see one really soon?"

And you don't mind saying good-night anymore. Because you know that before long, you'll be seeing David Cassidy alone again. ●
