

DEAR DAVID:

I think you're a really great actor, singer and musician and I like you very much. But there's one thing that puzzles me about you.

I've read in a lot of magazines that you really love your fans and all the letters and gifts they send, and that you enjoy going out and meeting them. Well, I can't really believe that's true. You're a very talented, successful and busy person, so why should it matter to you what a bunch of kids think? With all the fabulous things you do living in a glamorous place like Hollywood, it's hard to imagine that you'd find the time or the energy to think of your fans.

So what's the story? Do you really care as much as people say you do?

*Love,
Linda*
