

thing with another man's bride, Frank Sinatra was elbowing his way through the crowd towards Dino and Cathy and there is very little that Frank Sinatra misses and he missed absolutely nothing in this little drama being played out.

There is no doubt but that Cathy's pride was hurting.

As our source put it . . . "It was obvious. I mean, the pain was there in her eyes as if she was too hurt to cry but not too hurt not to want to be able to cry. I mean . . . the girl was writhing inside with agony 'cause until she got that ring on her third finger left, I mean, the ring that counts, Cathy wasn't about to stop feeling as if wherever she went people would poke fingers at her and accuse her of breaking up Dean's marriage."

Sinatra saw that pain. Sinatra saw the wounds that were showing in those big eyes. And, Sinatra did something which, for the rest of her life Cathy will always be grateful.

"Hey," Frank smiled. "When you've had enough of Dean's singing, how about you and me making some really good music together." He winked. She looked up; startled. Her nosy 'companion' gazed at Sinatra and mumbled something about . . . "Oh, Mr. Sinatra—how are you" and "I'm so happy to meet you. . . ." Frank inclined his head graciously in recognition of her abashed adoration. But, then, he returned to the mission of the moment; salving the wounds of Cathy Hawn who had been, he understood, unjustly attacked.

At that point, our reporter confided . . . "Frank told the lady that it was only because he was Dean Martin's good friend that he didn't make a play, for real, for Cathy. And, he also indicated that it was Cathy who was delaying the finalization of nuptial plans; not Dean. This, of course, put Cathy into a totally new picture now. The lady with the catty tongue looked as if she wanted to slink away and hide, Cathy looked at Frank as if she would be only too happy to shout her 'love' for him from every rooftop in gratitude for what he'd done for her . . ."

So, there you have it.

While Dean was bussing another man's bride, and Cathy was nursing her wounded pride, Frank Sinatra was performing another one of his usually not heralded good deeds. But, then, good deeds don't always have to be noised about. After all, they speak for themselves in the radiance that glows from eyes and faces of people who have been fortunate enough to have been in need of a friend indeed, indeed. ● girl because, well, if he doesn't stop thinking away his life about that girl in his past, and thinking about what a life they might have had if she'd become his wife, then the girl who does become his wife, while he's still in love with a memory, will find herself feeling as if she really were second best in his heart after all; will find herself wondering if he really did force himself to marry her because he really didn't love her enough to want to marry her."

An interesting comment. Yet, how
