Season Talks About Michael

I didn't really get to know Michael until we were about two or three days into filming the pilot for a television series, "Bobbie Jo and the Big Apple Goodtime Band." He's such a shy, private person that it takes a couple of days for him to come over and talk to you.

Once he gives you the gift of his friendship, though, you're in for a real treat. Michael is one of the most generous people I know. Every morning on the set he would leave some gag gift for me with a poem he had written. One day the gift was one of those fake snakes that jump out at you from the box and I jumped three feet into the air!

That's another side of Michael. He's a great joker. He loves to pull jokes, anything to make a friend laugh. He cares very much about the people he calls "friend," and there isn't anything he wouldn't do for one of them.

Michael is a quiet person. Often he doesn't have to say anything because his eyes do all the talking. He has the most expressive eyes I've ever seen. If you watch them, you can see every motion Michael is feeling.

Sensitivity is Michael's special quality. He is really tuned in to other people. One day I was feeling kind of low, and although I hadn't said anything to anybody about how I felt, Michael knew. He came over, took my hand, and asked me what was the matter. I found myself telling him all my problems—I must have talked his ear off—and he just nodded and kept giving me the understanding I needed.

By the time the show was finished, I felt as though I had known Michael since we were in kindergarten. Michael's not the type of person to end his friendship just because the show was over! Whenever I'm in town we try to call each other to say "Hello," or to get together to talk! Michael is such a very special person, and I'm so glad I've had the chance to meet him!
