

"Come Daydream With Me!"

by David

One of the most fun things to do in all the world is daydream! From the time we're small children we do it and the fun of daydreaming never grows old! David wants to share his most secret daydreams with you now!

HAVING CHILDREN

— Naturally, when you think about home your thoughts turn to a home filled with love. A home is just a sterile structure without someone there to love. Children seem to make a house come to life and though I know it's a long way off in my future, I do think about the day I'll be a father.

I want to expose my kids to all the groovy things there are in this world, for even with its problems, I'm thankful that I'm living right now. And I'll learn from them as I see the world through their eyes, like being a child all over again. Of course, it's hard to daydream about children without daydreaming about their mother—but we'll get to that later, okay?

A HOME OF MY OWN

— Right now, I dig where I'm living, but in the back of my mind, I know it's not mine. So, I often find myself daydreaming about a home of my own. In fact, I dream about two or three homes (after all we are daydreaming!).

One is on a cliff overlooking the mysterious ocean. It's a house made of wood and glass so that it blends in with the surrounding nature and still lets me experience the infinite changes of the sea. It would have a staircase leading down to the beach so I could scuba dive right in my own private cove.

Another house would have to be in the mountains because no where else can I feel that crystal clear, cold air on my face and the stillness of a snow-covered mountain.

I'd also love to have a house in Europe—I don't know exactly where because I loved so much of the European continent. But I know it would be out in the country where the people are friendly and the pace is slow. Europe is a magical place where it's like stepping back in time and I'd love to spend several months a year there.

A QUIET LIFE — First off, I want you to know I love my life as it is right now. But, let's face it, it does get hectic. I do dream sometimes about living in a cabin in Alaska. Just me and my hunting dog really surviving off the land in a true wilderness.

As I think longer, I realize I would really dig this sort of thing, but only for a few weeks or months. I'd love the rugged feeling of having my life depend solely on me, but I know I would miss the contact with other human beings. Nature is a wonderful and fascinating thing, but people have their special place in my world too.
