

WHAT PEOPLE ARE WEARING OVERSEAS

Jagger and Ekland . . . creatively decadent

And in the centre ring . . . actress Britt Ekland looking pre-war Berlin decadent in ringmaster's gear. Miss Ekland, who is in her mid-thirties, has a new boyfriend. He is 17-year-old David Hayman, son of the Hollywood producer John Hayman. No sign of Hayman junior at the opening of Miss Ekland's new play "Mate" in London. He was too busy with exams and, besides, his Mum kept him home. Over in America, that glittering party couple Richard and Susan Burton are acting together for the first time. Very deja vu for Richard who did likewise with Elizabeth Taylor. Susan's role is small. Richard's is big: he's a reformed alcoholic which friends say is his cup of tea. Over to Mia Farrow. She is not so much acting as acting-up these days. In fact, she has cooled off her eight-year-old marriage to Andre Previn and is overcome by the charms of cameraman Sven Nykquist who she met filming in exotic Bora Bora. Further, she wants his baby. Which must be a relief to director George Cukor who went partying with her: he in black tie, she in black dress. Over to tempestuous Bianca Jagger who is going into (wait for it) singing. That is to say, the contract is signed for a disco album but she has traded off riches for what is loosely called "creative control." David Cassidy, on the tiles with wife Kay, is making a comeback: as a soft-hearted policeman on TV. Some beat.
