

TUCSON DAILY CITIZEN
TUESDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1976

It's hard to imagine what David Cassidy and Mick Ronson would be like in a band together. David, who's survived his teenybopper phenomenon career but has had trouble finding his correct musical direction, and Mick, who's lived through the early Bowie hysteria, an ill-fated collaboration with Ian Hunter and the recent Rolling Thunder Revue, are an odd couple, indeed.

Their plans are still in the formative stages, but Cassidy told me, "We've been playing together and writing a bit. It's kind of delicate, because I'd like to make a definite commitment. I can't afford to do anything halfway. But we're not exactly sure that we'll go out together, yet."