David Cassidy, once the heart-throb of all teens, requested a chilled bottle of Piper Heidsieck champagne, six glasses, a box of imported chocolates and a basket of fresh fruit — in his waiting limousine at Hancock Airport — before a scheduled concert stop in September, 1972, at the Onondaga War Memorial.

Van Halen, a rock group new to the scene, said it would fulfill a summer concert date at Syracuse University contingent on the supply of 300 pounds of dry ice.

And Australian pop singer Helen Reddy, who performed with Bill Cosby at last Friday night's Crouse-Irving Memorial Hospital benefit, required dressing room needs so singular they forced organizers to rent the use of an air-streamed trailer for one evening.

Those who have staged performances of musicians, comics and other entertainers locally recognize all too well that big stars with big names and big egos have big demands.
