Hello there!

It's not true, you know! And for once I'm not talking about the latest rumour of David getting married, engaged, divorced or whatever! No . . . I'm thinking about the old saying that says: "Familiarity breeds contempt".

Any old proverb like that only has to bump into David Cassidy and it's got to admit, straight out, that it's wrong . . . plain wrong! I have now met David on each of his three trips to Britain, and every time I meet him he seems a whole lot nicer than the last time . . . It may seem impossible, but it's true!

David isn't the sort of guy to let you get to know him all in a rush. Mind you, on a first meeting, he's absolutely charming and he puts you at your ease at once! I ought to know . . . I can still remember — as though it were yesterday — my very first meeting with David.

I was just so nervous that it seems unbelievable looking back! But that's because I know him so much better now. At that time, I went absolutely dumb and my knees tried to dissolve — or that's the way it felt anyhow!

David says himself that he can relax a whole lot more when he's over here now than he could at first, because he reckons that he knows us much better now. And that makes him feel good, and secure, because right from the start it's as if he's meeting up with all his old friends again! Well, you must get the same sort of feeling yourself . . . As though you now really know David deep down, instead of just recognising him by surface things. Anyone who loves David in the way that you do, MUST get to know the real David through it. And that's a very wonderful thing: it's something worth waiting for, as I'm sure you'll agree!

But love also has its painful side . . . The pain of parting. However long David managed to spend over here, it could never be enough (unless it was every minute of every day of his whole life!). It's impossible not to resent the plane which whisks him off again, away from us. After all, we know that it may be months before we'll set eyes on him again.

It might be some help to know that David feels just the same way about it. He hates saying goodbye to a place he's been happy in . . . to people he's grown to love. And one very special thing you soon discover about David is that he has an infinite capacity for love.

He can't help loving every one of his fans. When you love him, you — in turn — become important to him. And, when you're a superstar as big and bright as David is right now, that surely must be something really special!

When I last spoke to him on the 'phone, for instance, he couldn't talk about anything except YOU . . . How marvellous you were, how beautiful and what an outasight time you'd dreamed up for him over here!
