

DAVID'S PERSONAL LETTER TO YOU

know, is my step-mom) takes a look in here to see how I'm getting along, she always ribs me about the fact that I'm sitting on a piece of furniture at all!

That goes back to the time when I moved out from home into my first apartment with Sam, my close friend. We went for the important things in life—like cars, stereo systems and dogs, and we didn't give that much thought to conventional things like chairs and tables. . . . With the result that it came a habit with me to sit on the floor! (We'd got loads of cushions and things, so it was really cosy.)

For quite a time, I didn't even have a bed! I slept on the floor as well—on a mattress, of course, but it still felt mighty close to the floor for all that!

That, however, was NOT by choice, like the chair thing was! So, just as soon as I could, I bought me the nicest bed I could find. It was a real big, roomy one. My bed needs to be that way, because I don't just use it as a bed—I use it as a general sort of living unit.

RELAXING

I sprawl all over it to learn my lines, to listen to music and just generally to relax. And, if there's a dog around at the time and he's looking for somewhere comfortable to rest his paws—why then, he's always welcome to jump up and join me there!

Hey! I've just caught sight of the amount I've written—and this was supposed to be just a short letter! I guess I must have had so much to say that I got carried away. It sure doesn't seem as though I've been writing a long while, but now I look at my wristwatch I know I've been scribbling away for a half-hour at the least.

See the effect this has had on me? I never used to like writing letters and I used to have to stretch my literary efforts to get them to seven or eight lines.

Now I can't wait to make contact again next month. Till then. . . .

Working on songs for his next L.P. is a serious matter for David but Danny Bonaduce, who plays his brother in the Partridge Family series, listens in while he catches up on the latest Hollywood 'gossip'.
