

BOBBY Sherman's a few years older and David Cassidy's a few inches taller. But they're very much alike in other ways. They share a common first love for music and both are good musicians and song-writers as well as singers. But both came to the attention of the public through their work as television actors. (Ironically, Bobby's show, "Here Come the Brides," is going off the air just as David's show, "The Partridge Family," is making its debut.) Both are serious by nature, but with just enough of a fun-loving streak to make them appealing. Both belong to the rare breed of Hollywood bachelor who shuns the loud parties and booming private clubs and prefers a more quiet and even life.

Both, too, are faced with a problem—a girl problem. She's young, pretty in a natural way, interested in music and dancing and films. She goes to rock concerts in pants and belts and scarves and she knows how to show her enthusiasm. She spends most of her money on records, cosmetics and clothes. And she's not the easiest person in the world to please. Even more important, she's hard to keep pleased!

Bobby's known her for several years. They met way back when he was one of the "regulars" on a variety show called "Shindig." She wrote to Bobby—a long letter full of warmth and love and happiness. And although Bobby was very surprised to get her first letter, he quickly grew to appreciate them.

It seemed like the ideal romance. Bobby Sherman and the girl would be a twosome forever. But it didn't work out that way. When "Shindig" was cancelled, she eventually stopped writing to Bobby, going to his concerts and buying his records. She found someone else.

Then, two years ago, Bobby appeared on TV again in "Here Come the Brides." And she saw him.
