in her personality, and I have truly enjoyed knowing her.

Dave Madden, too, has been a pleasure to know. He is a man with many interests, including photography and some areas, I suppose, of literature and psychology, and he is a willing and able conversationalist. What I find most attractive about him is his ability to make people know he is concerned with their interests. Of course he is also a very funny comedian.

CLOSE TO MY AGE

The only people left are the two Partridges closest to my age, Susan and David. Naturally I know Susan very well, and I have to admit that writing anything like this is rather difficult for me to do. All the usual adjectives—kind, thoughtful, honest, intelligent—fit her, I know, but something still is lacking in my trying to describe her for you. If it were at all possible for you to really know her, and not just see her on television or her picture in magazines, I know you would be as unable as I am to describe her as well as she ought to be described. However, it isn't possible for everyone to become Susan's friend, but I wish you would try to picture Susan as you would anyone you would want as a good and lifelong friend. If you can do that, then you have something of my opinion of Susan.

What is David like, to me? I think he has a strong career ahead of him—everything good is just in front of him. I've talked to David about himself; I know he'd like most of all to be satisfied personally with whatever he is doing. No matter what it is that he is attempting, if David isn't satisfied, and if he really believes that the project is worth his wholehearted effort, then he will work with all his strength until he himself is happy with the results. That explains David, I guess—a young man looking for his personal satisfaction in something meaningful to himself.

Now that I've said my goodbyes to the Partridges and wished them all good luck in the future, I say the same to you. I've been happy to write these articles for you, and I hope you know a little better what a television series is all about!
