Finally I ran out of words, and I took a deep breath in the silence. Strangely, I felt more peaceful than I had in a long time! And then David began to talk, and his first words startled me.

"I think I know how you feel, just a little bit anyway," he said. It was his turn, and I listened to every word he said—about how he had felt when his father had remarried, and a lot of other things that will always stay personal between us. "But you have to give Lisa a chance," he said softly. "I know you'll grow to love her as much as I love Shirley."

"THAT'S A LIE"

For the first time that long afternoon, he smiled, taking my chin in his hand. "And as far as you're being a nobody, you nutty little thing, that's just a lie you've made yourself believe! Just like you're telling yourself that you don't need anybody! The whole secret to being happy is knowing how much you need other people—finding them and letting them find you!"

"You are right, David. It's just that it's hard for me to make friends..."

"If you try a third as hard as you do running away from people, you're going to do just fine!" he laughed. "There are a million things at school that a girl with your brains
