

LIVING WITH DAVID

ach. Of course my friend, The Old Pro Cassidy, kept telling me to "cool it... everything will be a snap." Somehow I made it through the day and got to the restaurant feeling like a moose was being born in my chest.

We set up our equipment and went backstage. Nobody talked very much, and I noticed that even David looked a little touchy. Finally the moment came. We sort of pushed one another onstage and waited in the dark until we heard this weirdo electric voice saying "And now... The PAINS OF GLASS!" Then the lights went up, the curtain parted, and suddenly I felt great! Our first number was The Beatles' "Help," and I counted off (real loud and professionally) "One! Two! Three!" and waited for that crashing drum-beat from David and his carefully rehearsed vocal. Nothing. Not a sound. I looked over at "Cool" David and he was as green as the grass, staring at me like I had just knocked him down or something. He was frozen stiff (just like in the first episode of "The Partridge Family") and the only thing he could get out was this sort of croaking whisper: "I can't sing it! It's too high!"

Well, I am rarely at a loss for words, so I just shouted "Four! Five! Six! Seven!" and I could have gone all the way to a hundred but the other guy finally got the idea and started playing the intro to our second song. Somehow we got it underway and played through the rest of our set.

As to how we went over... well, I didn't see anybody actually leave, but I know for a fact that people had fantastic conversations, talked about things they hadn't talked about for years, during the forty-five minutes we were crashing away up there! When we finally got off, there was a little applause (it sounded like they were slapping mosquitoes in the dark) and the Pains of Glass shattered on the spot. We never really got it together musically again.

Listen, I've got to run now, but I'll tell you more of these fabulous adventures next month. See you then!
