

That beautiful stained glass window David Cassidy is standing in front of is one of the reasons he ran away from his old home to the new one he shares with you on the next five pages.

But the more personal reason David had to "escape" his former pad was privacy . . . and the threat of losing it! More and more people had gotten hold of his unlisted telephone number and private street address.

After spending a day on the set, and spending a night in the recording studio, David believes that he's entitled to some privacy after hours.

So that's why he just moved into this new house of which he's so very proud—high in the Hollywood hills, far from the maddening crowds down below on Sunset Boulevard yet close to the Columbia Studios on North Beechwood Drive.

David wanted you to see his house . . . and he invited you to visit it. His tour, hand-in-hand with yours, begins on page 32!
