DAVID CASSIDY

I guess it's natural for people to assume that two young single people who work together must have something romantic going, but Susan and I are just good friends. I know that sounds corny. Everyone says "we're just friends," but it's the truth. We are friends, very good friends.

In the beginning when I first met her, I dated her a couple of times. I took her to a couple of movies and out to dinner, and things like that, and I really liked her.

But because of the fact that we have to work together, we just became good friends. It never evolved into anything more than that. She's just like a very close friend, or a sister that I care about a lot, but we both go out with other people.

I think the relationship we have, just liking each other a lot, works out much better for working purposes. It gets kind of difficult if you've got a big romantic thing going, and then you have a fight or break up, yet you still have to work with each other every day. This way we can kid each other and have good times, but whatever romances we have will be with other people.

I like Susan a lot, and she's a very beautiful girl, but we are just good friends.

My relationship with David is, well, he's probably the closest one to me on the set, because he's more my contemporary than anyone else on the show.

When I first came out to Hollywood I was a bundle of nerves and insecurities, and he helped me all the way. Our relationship right now is probably even nicer than any kind of closer relationship, because it is just pure friendship and it's all based on honesty.

There aren't any hassles and we have a lot of fun. We can tease each other with no feelings hurt. We're very honest with each other,
