DAVID IN HAWAII CONTINUED FROM PAGE 13

through the packing and got to Maui airport in plenty of time.

Unfortunately, our airplane didn't get to Maui airport in plenty of time—in fact, it was almost two hours late! We paced around waiting until the two girls who worked in the soda fountain recognized David and gave him a giant carnation lei. And also extra-thick malts.

But we were too late getting into Honolulu to catch the plane we had been reserved on, and that was the only plane that could have gotten us home on Christmas Eve! We were pretty upset, I have to admit, and we were both sure that we'd miss Christmas completely! Also, David was worried that our dogs wouldn't be fed, so we all had to call the mainland.

GIFT FOR FANS

The only plane we could get home didn't leave until eleven that night, so we decided to go out to dinner to one of Honolulu's most beautiful restaurants. This time, though, our appetites weren't so outrageous; I think that eating Christmas Eve dinner in a restaurant brought us down a little bit. We still had a pretty good time though, and the food, as I remember it, was great. Also, there were two little girls there, about ten years old, who were having dinner with their mother. When they looked up and recognized David, they almost swallowed their forks! They whispered back and forth like little birds, but they didn't want David to think they were staring at him, so they always looked away whenever we glanced over at them. Finally, David gave them a Christmas present: he suddenly got up and walked right over to their table and started talking to them! They were thrilled and excited, and he wrote each of them a long inscription on their napkins before he came back to our table.

Finally, we were loaded onto our plane and on our way home. We slept almost all the way, even though David always says he can't sleep on planes, and when we opened our eyes, bright California sunshine was streaming in through the plane windows and we were touching down.

It was 6:30 Christmas morning when we landed, and we split up at the airport. David went to his father's house, and I went home and slept the whole day. I know that we both sort of wished we were still in Hawaii, but Los Angeles tried to welcome us back, because it was clear and blue and cold, and the ride back home through the beautiful, deserted Christmas morning streets felt just great, a fine ending to a wonderful trip!

Don't forget to tune in right here next month when I'll be telling you more exciting secrets from David's past and his present! Until then, be happy!
