next big mature matinee idol."

But he's been plagued by bad breaks in his career. Jack has had a modicum of success but nowhere near the extent that he really does deserve. One of the problems in his marriage has been the fact that he seems generally in the shadow of Shirley's more spectacular career. She has had top movie stardom and now commands a successful weekly television series. Even David, his son, has hit it bigger than he ever had—indeed, bigger than Shirley and Jack put together.

"It's a bad combination," commented an insider. "You have a wife who outdistances you and then, also, a son. You're left a poor third. That's an awful blow for a guy whose ego is as big as Mount Everest!"

So, Jack is trying to salvage something for himself. Producing plays can be a highly profitable—or disastrous—business. One hit and he's on easy street; one flop and that image of his may have been dealt a final, fatal blow.

Jack undoubtedly is willing to gamble. He's already having a rough time of it, so he probably supposes the situation really can't get very much worse than it is now.

However, his gambling seems to be not only in the area of his career but his domestic life as well.

"Shirley can overlook a lot," stated another source exclusive to TV STAR PARADE. "But there will come a limit, someday."

By being linked with Mira Walters, Jack is compounding an extramarital controversy with a racial one. The ground he is treading on is dangerous, to say the least.

Apparently, though, Jack has always been one to take a chance. According to a reporter for one of the Los Angeles newspapers, he has essentially a playboy nature. His personality is almost incapable of being tied down in any way. That's why he drifts from one profession to another. He has been a dancer, a singer, an actor and now he wants to be a producer. He's restless, basically not content.

This is a pity because in Shirley Jones, Jack has a wife who is all a wife should be.

"Shirley is a real sweetheart!" one of her closest friends exclaimed. "I have never known anyone as kind, tender and, well, just so wonderful as she is."

The friend might well have added. . . "If only Jack were to realize the kind of woman he has at home."

Acknowledging that the present situation is an explosive one, the next thing to consider is Shirley's silence in the matter. She has said absolutely nothing! Not a single word! And cynics are suggesting again and again that she keeps silent because she cannot say anything in denial. Mira and Jack do work together; they have been seen out together. What more could possibly be said in this regard?

Actually, Shirley's silence is deliberate. She may have a great deal to say but she is keeping her mouth tightly shut. And
