for a very important reason, though you may disagree with it!

"Anything that is said could add fuel to the fire," we were told. "Shirley undoubtedly reasons that the controversy will blow over sooner this way than if she jumped into the arena and fanned it further."

But can she continue this way in the event the plot thickens, so to speak, and Jack goes out with Mira more often than may be the case thus far?

David's defense of his father could well be as ill-timed as Shirley feels her own remarks would be. Behind-the-scenes, there must be considerable arguments between the two of them since they seem to hold such different points of view.

"David becomes very, very angry when his father's integrity is questioned," confirmed one columnist. "He feels that he must speak up, regardless of the consequences."

That Jack appreciates his son's support is beyond doubt.

"I'm very proud of him," Jack said. "David's a fine actor and singer but more important, he's a warm, compassionate and curious human being. He's very open and though he's sometimes shy he's usually at ease with most people. I think David's free of prejudice and pettiness; his name for me holds trust and strength. David's a positive and persuasive person... a great son in every way!"

There is so much talk today of a generation gap. And David and his father don't, as we said, see eye-to-eye on everything. But they have managed to keep their differences from splitting them apart.

"I think it's foolish for kids to rebel from their parents in ways that create a permanent gap," David has said. "After all, we do owe our mothers and fathers a lot, and it's terribly cruel to throw that out the window just because they think a different way about politics or sex than we do. We should respect their right to hold an opinion just as we want them to respect a similar right as far as we are concerned!"

One of the thoughts that continues to terrify David is that he will lose his father. The bond between them is so strong that it will probably never be broken. But he worries that the opposite will happen.

"This started years ago," Jack remarked a few months back. "He worried that I would never return to him, that I would stay away. This was right after the divorce from his mother, Evelyn Ward."

The fear began then and it has remained ever since—though David has been able to cope with it more readily now that he is a more mature person than was once the case.

But can that bond, that loyalty continue if Jack's marriage to Shirley is wrecked by his extramarital behavior? You see, David also loves his stepmother very much and if his father were to hurt her in any way, that could be the final straw.

It is hoped that common sense prevails all around, that the situation with Jack
