

PARTRIDGE

WHEN YOU look at The Partridges cheerfully acting and singing together, you'd never think that they could cause one another a single unhappy moment. But that's not true. Though they never deliberately try to hurt one another it still happens. The Partridges are just like any other family—they hurt each other a little bit because they care so much. Here's how . . .

DAVID hurts the others when something's bothering him and he refuses to tell them what it is. The Partridges are like a real family and feel he should be able to confide in them. Besides, when David's not smiling, it's awfully hard for anyone else to smile.

SUSAN hurts her TV family when she arrives on the set looking and feeling very homesick. The Partridges all know how much she misses her mom and dad and sister and brother, and they don't like to see her sad. It just seems to make the day drag for everyone.

DANNY hurts the other Partridges when he's a little late returning to work after a break. He likes to spend his free time whizzing around on his mini-bike, and they're always worried he might get into an accident.

SUZANNE hurts the others when she looks unhappy because she can't bring her little gray kitten, Kiddles, to the set. Everyone knows how much she loves him and wishes she could bring him everywhere with her, but they also know she'd feel a lot worse if Kiddles ran away while she was doing a scene.

SHIRLEY hurts her Partridge kids when she doesn't let them stuff themselves with sweets when they should be eating a well-balanced lunch. But they realize that she's just watching out for them the way she does her own family.

DAVID hurts his TV family when he goes off by himself after he's finished doing a scene. They understand how important his work is to him and that he may want to go over his lines for the next scene, but they also think he's a really good friend and they'd like to spend more time with him.
