

David's Tearful Prayer:

Sometimes it's hard to say two very simple words . . . "I'm Sorry!" David Cassidy wants to say those words to YOU—will you believe him?

As David sang the last chorus of "I Think I Love You" to the thousands of fans crowded in the auditorium, he stared out at the faces lining the edge of the stage.

He had barely sung the last few words when he saw the uniformed guards come between him and the faces he loved. Then before his disappointment was obvious, he heard his name whispered.

When he turned to see who was calling to him, David saw another uniformed guard gesturing for him to hurry. David looked once more at the loving faces who brought him so much happiness.

As he gazed into the sea of faces, his eyes caught sight of one small, blonde girl in the front row. She had tears in her eyes—and the expression on her face broke David's heart!

David raced offstage and one last backward glance told him that he was being separated from his fans once again by the guards. In those fleeting seconds it took him to dash towards the safety of the awaiting car, David realized the importance of the guards.

Although the guards kept him away from touching and talking to his fans, they also did a great service for David and his fans—the guards stopped anyone from getting hurt!

At one of his first concerts, David didn't realize the importance the guards played in his safety and in his fans' safety. During his first concerts all he could think about was the great love he received and gave to his fans. David just knew that with such a great love existing, no harm or damage could ever happen!

David shivered when he remembered what had happened when he first tried to ignore the guards' requests to stay away from the edge of the stage. He had walked towards the outstretched hands and reached down to touch them.

At first contact, David was thrilled beyond any happiness he had ever known before. Here were people who wanted to see him, hear him, and
