However, he made it in show-business without help from his family.

When David is surrounded by his friends and managers and all the many other people who have become part of his life, he seems most comfortable and secure. In a similar way David expresses himself with his fans while onstage. He has been known to shout over and over to his adoring fans, "I love you . . . I love you . . . I love you". . . almost as if his feelings were an enormous arm ready to embrace his adoring public. In the same way, his fans seem to sense how much he needs them, they return his love with huge waves of appreciation. While onstage David and his public are truly one and together.

Love has been the missing ingredient in many of David's early successes, since he pleads unfamiliarity with the real meaning of the word. All he will say is, "I know that I'm missing something important in my life, whether it is loving one person forever, or not, I still don't know."

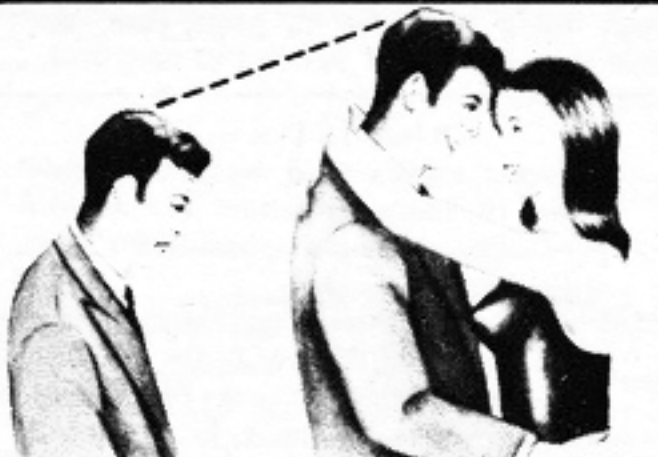

What David does know, is the fact that he has suddenly become able to shield himself from the lonely nights and empty days that once characterized his existence. No longer does he have to wander around alone wondering about his future, since he is assured that his talent will have a real future! When David reaches out, there is always a hand to grasp his, in fact, recently while in New York David had the altogether new experience of revisiting many places of his childhood and feeling free to recount his earlier experiences. He is much like a locked safe, slowly becoming open.

It was in Central Park, that David began to speak about a time when he played basketball in the park, and strove for excellence. He said, "All the kids would meet here in the park, and play whenever the weather was right, I always felt a little out of it since I was very unsure of myself at that time. But I knew that I wanted to play, so I just came. But there was this one particular boy who used to goad me all the time, he had a real thing about me. I thought that I was going to have to fight him. My struggle was whether or not to return everyday and get goaded by this kid. I fought my desire not to show up. I thought to myself, come what may I'm not going to let myself get out of control. It was a real trauma at the time. One day the kid said to me, 'If you come back tomorrow I'll beat you up.'

"That night I spent the longest night of my life deciding what to do, I wanted to ask somebody, but there was no one to ask, I knew it was my decision. Only the next morning did I decide to go and face him, the sense of relief I felt once making the decision was unbelievable, it taught me a big lesson, one that I've lived ever since. I trusted my instincts and found that I was able to make a very hard decision. I still try to do that. In fact by that afternoon when it was time to go to the park I was really ready to face that kid, he saw it in my face, and suddenly he found himself backing down, he knew that I would take no more goading. In fact after that he
