

once described his "ideal girl" as "somebody who likes to have a good time. She doesn't spend the whole time you're together looking into a mirror—that's a turn-off. She has lots of interests, can talk about a lot of things, and can listen."

"It doesn't matter if she has blonde, brown or red hair. Come to think of it, it doesn't really matter what she looks like physically. The important things are that she be a girl with a soft, shiny quality, that she be open and giving. But the truly important thing above all else is that she be honest—the important thing is honesty."

His description fits Susan Dey perfectly, but, possibly because she was an actress, possibly because they had to work together, or possibly just because he wasn't ready for a serious, long-term relationship, he never pursued her romantically. Today, he may wish that he had taken her more seriously, that he had explored other possibilities in their relationship, that he had cherished her more than he had.

But all is not lost. David is smart enough to realize that men do not always win the first woman they loved, and if he did actually love Susan, he can take solace in the certainty that in time he will find someone else, especially now that he is looking. Probably next time he will learn to trust his impulses, to be more in touch with his feelings. And David can even improve his relationship with Susan if he wants to, by cherishing what he does have with her—a deep and lasting friendship.

It appears to be a completely wonderful romance, yet lately, handsome Desi is being faced with a completely unforeseen problem—Liza is spending more and more time with another man, and a much, much older man at that!

When Liza talks about him, it's in exclamation points: "He's so charming, a total gentleman. What he's been through in his three marriages! He's spoiled rotten every woman he's ever been married to. And they left him. And I watched it happen, watched women taking advantage of him. He's incredibly gentle, talks very vaguely, but he's probably the strongest man I ever met. When I said something to him about his wives, he said he didn't understand. 'Well, you give them everything they want,' I said. And he said, 'I always thought that's what women were for.'"

The man for whom Liza feels such concern is none other than her father, Vincente Minnelli, and now that Liza is fulfilling the bright promise of her childhood, father and daughter are be-
