keep her skin looking dry (matte). I keep this look during the whole working day by just blotting her face with astringent and tissues.

Matching the shade of your make up to your skin really isn't a problem either. All you've got to remember is to match the shade you use on your face, with the shade of the skin under your chin! If you follow that rule—presto! Perfect make up.

I've also got an oily skin problem with two other Partridge stars! Dave Madden and David Cassidy! If you've ever wondered why actors wear make up, that's the reason. Film is so sensitive and the bright lights make it even harder for a person to come out looking like he does in true life!

Take Dave Madden, for example. He's got a very ruddy complexion. Seeing him in person, he looks great—the color in his face gives him a healthy glow—but, under the camera lights it appears too red and then when you see him on television you'd think he was always blushing!

That's why he's got to wear a make up under base we call mellow yellow. That's just what it does—mellows the red in the skin tone for the lights so that on film we've got the real Dave Madden!

David Cassidy's problem is mostly in the oiliness of his skin, which again causes too much shine on camera. But we can keep it dry looking by applying pancake make up with astringent and water. Then, by continually blotting his face with astringent throughout the day, his complexion stays fresh and healthy as well as dry for the camera!
