

SUSAN & DAVID: "Their Special Kind of Love"

was the caring of two people who loved each other.

But it wasn't the type of love to base a life-long marriage upon. And they both knew it. Maybe they both felt a little sad when the discovery had been made about each other. After all, Susan is a lovely and wonderful girl—a one-of-a-kind type of girl. And David, when he finds the right girl, will give her the happiness only he can give.

But for each other, it is simply a love based on caring about what happens to the other person; wishing only good things and happy times. And David is more than glad that he has this love of Susan's.

He knows that she will always be there if he needs the friendship he shares only with her.

For of the many things he and Susan have talked about and shared, one is this: that perhaps all that really matters in any human being's life is knowing that he is important in the lives of the people he cares about.

And David and Susan do care. Love isn't the word to use with them. That's something they're both wishing for each other—some-day.
