

incursions of his intensely loyal and over-enthusiastic admirers. For instance, one morning at 6:30 a bleary-eyed David popped into his car to drive to the studio—and next to him sat a teenage girl! This enterprising young lady had found out where David lived and—the previous evening, after he had parked his car in the carport—she had emerged from her hiding place in the bushes and spent the night in David's car—a night of waiting and hoping which brought its reward with the dawn, much to her joy and much to David's dismay.

Lots of David's fans have older friends or relatives who can drive and they haunt the exit gate at the Columbia-Screen Gems television ranch in hopes of spotting David leaving the set. If they do, the rest is easy. They simply trail him home—and then proceed to make themselves "at home" in David's house!

BEHIND THE LOCKED DOOR

So far, the house David has most recently moved into hasn't been "discovered." He can still spend an evening lolling about in his luxurious living room, playing billiards or banging on the drums—three things he loves to do—without worrying about incessant phone calls or an endless stream of strangers ringing his door bell or climbing through his kitchen window. But David's free and easy evenings are numbered—and he knows it. He's already prepared for the "days of siege" that may lie ahead—that will force him to become an unwilling Howard Hughes-like recluse—locked up in one room and forced to create a whole world for himself in that room.

But there's an ironic twist to all this, because—in his heart of hearts—David doesn't want to be alone, he doesn't want to be separated from you, he doesn't want to be locked away from the fun-filled, exciting and romantic world he knows he can share with you. But what can he do? Despair not, DC-dollies—cos your boy David has come up with an answer, and what a spectacular answer it is!

David has figured out a way you—and only you—can go behind that closed and locked door with him and share every intimate detail of what it's like there and what he does there with him—personally. So get ready for the David Cassidy thrill of your lifetime when David at last shares his secret room with you (a room where only he has gone so far). It's all in the June issue of 16 Magazine—which goes on sale April 20! Meet David here then!!
