■ Is it true that David Cassidy is killing himself? And is it true that David has no time to court girls?

(Robin Dennis, Rutland, Vermont)

Of course David Cassidy is NOT killing himself—any more than millions of the rest of us who tend to overwork, go without quite enough sleep, and don't always eat the right things! David is a very alive, thoughtful, conscientious young man who has a lot to live for and no reason to want to give it up. The very fact that he has consulted doctors, has undergone surgery, and has hired extra help, all point up the fact that he intends to not only survive, but do so in a healthy, wealthy atmosphere. He realizes that he will not remain a teen idol forever—in fact, he gives himself a year or so at the very most!—and is now putting the money he is raking in to good use in investments that will pay off later when he faces the "slow" years in his career, when he tries to become a dramatic actor and serious musician. Because he wants to make the most of this time of great success and constant demand, he has taken very little time out for any sort of social life. But he isn't a hermit by any means! So relax. His life is in good hands: his own!

Please would you publish for me the address of actor Michael Parks who recently starred in the TV series "Then Came Bronson." I recently read an article about him and know only that he lives in a place called Uija. Thank you so very much.
