tery until he relents. I don't think for a second that he merely took a hot bath and read himself to sleep with a good book.

He drove to Florence to see the David sculpted by Michelangelo and some of the other art treasures there.

Several American college girls, students at Stanford-in-Italy, spotted him. They didn't scream. They could sense he wasn't doing a star number, so they simply nodded and said "Hi!" and went on. David never wanted to go to college, studied acting for a year with a Los Angeles theatre group and then enrolled in classes at a school for musical comedy New York while preparing as an actor. Still he's interested in the conditions that challenge all young people. He can discuss many subjects intelligently, partly because he's had to adjust to realities as far back as he can remember. His folks inspire him, so he's considered happiness a do-it-yourself project. Though he sympathizes with anyone who's suppressed, rebelling destructively seems a ridiculous waste of energy.

Naturally, David had Venice on his agenda. It's not nearly as magical in its bleak wintertime. With bedding in his camper, he could sleep in it whenever he wanted. He wound up spending most of his holiday high in the Italian Alps.

Although he's slight, he's athletically inclined. Riding is his favorite exercise when he's home. In Italy, he learned to ski. He hasn't become a Jean-Claude Killy, but he caught on so quickly when he took lessons that he was soon one of the happiest people on the snowy slopes. Ski resorts like those in the Valle D'Aosta north of Turin are heavenly spots for the future in David's mind. Towering peaks were the breathtaking backdrops for the vast blanket of snow where he skied. It would have been a terrible disaster if he'd broken a leg, he concedes. So he didn't!

Returning to a Chalet-type mountain hotel with the new friends he met there meant another cup of steaming espresso, a hot shower, and a leisurely dinner with cheerful flames crackling in a huge stone fireplace.

David faced his greatest danger then—the girls who didn't know he was a teenage idol. His gentlemanly manners distinguished him. The young women spoke English just well enough for him not to be mistaken about their hopes. More sophisticated than any he'd ever dated, they ate their cannellioni, or a plate of polenta, with the healthy gusto that continued when they danced with David. They assumed he felt the emotions he's postponed to win at his work first.

He'd wanted people to relate to him as he is now, not be limited by what they respond to when he's performing. And he wasn't sorry when they did. If a girl liked him, he knew it was for himself—for what she saw in front of her. He dared to be vulnerable in Italy. Yet he didn't deceive any of the girls, or himself.

Those carefree weeks in Italy made him acknowledge to himself that he'd like to be crazy, totally in love as soon as he can handle it. David's changed in this regard, doesn't imagine he has to wait until he's a lot older. He never went steady in his
