teens and hasn't tried it since. He knew that he wanted to become an actor, that he couldn't drift to succeed in such a difficult field. He wouldn't allow himself to lean on any girl's designs for them. Older women who'd made their mark in show business, such as his mother and Shirley and Ruth Aarons, the brilliant personal manager who's advised stars so wisely, were career guides for him when he was a beginner and will remain as significant, as appreciated, in his working areas. They haven't tried to keep him away from girls he might have fallen for. They respect his character, his willingness to be self-reliant.

When Shirley announced that she and his father had separated after fifteen years of marriage, while he was in those Italian Alps, that was a disaster to him. He didn't discuss it with anyone. He had been upset when his own parents divorced, though he was only five, and when his mother and his stepfather split during his midteens. Undoubtedly, their disappointments have made him more cautious than he would have been if he could have visualized marriage as living happily ever after. But David has never once blamed his elders. He thinks he'd be frightfully presumptuous to criticize anyone who's been troubled by love.

Ask him to sum up his initial adventures in Europe and he'll say, as Robert Browning, the supremely romantic poet did first:

*Open my heart and you will see,
Graved inside of it, "Italy."*

At the end of his wonderful month entirely on his own there, David had to meet a business associate in London for conferences. He had three days before returning home, so he crammed in some sights.

Then, at home in the San Fernando Valley, he prepared for the seventeen one-night stands he'd been booked for in Houston, Madison Square Garden in Manhattan, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Washington, D.C., Baltimore, and Knoxville. This April he's entertaining in Memphis, Louisville, Charlotte, and Greensboro, North Carolina, and others.

And, this May, he remains heart-free. He hopes this condition won't last too long! Whatever it was David learned about love in Europe—he tried it . . . he liked it!
