sign up for that or, if it's too late or you can't work that much, apply for a temporary job to substitute for an usher who may be ill when your fave appears.

Ushers do have to work before a performance—so meeting your fave then probably won't happen. But when the concert is over, you can be the first person at the stage door and you can meet your fave when he comes out.

6. Make friends with his mother. This may sound far-out to you but we know a girl who received a long-distance call from George Harrison because his mother asked him to call her! This girl had written kind, intelligent letters to George's mother and the two had become pen-pals. When George visited the U.S. for the first time, he happily called to say hello and would have come to dinner at her house if the Beatles hadn't rushed off to the Bahamas. See? This method really works!

7. Organize a charity benefit in his honor. This will take some long-range planning on your part. Find a worthy charity, preferably a national one, and plan an event such as a banquet or a dance or a drawing to collect money. Then, write to your fave's manager and explain your plans (also
