

because he's afraid David is hurting himself, and he can't bear to see it."

On the other hand, says another source close to the family, "What did Jack expect? That David would come and ask his advice about this? First of all, this is a new time for young people. They're not all that self-conscious about baring their bodies. And secondly, where was Jack all through David's childhood, when the boy might have gotten into the habit of asking his advice? True, Jack wanted to be there, and wasn't through no real fault of his own. But the point is, he wasn't there. And it's a little late to start playing the outraged father now. I don't think David even knows why he's so angry."

"Maybe David doesn't fully understand why his father is so irate," another of Jack's associates mused. "But he adores Jack, and feels terrible about this. However, deep down, I think he also realizes that it's only because Jack loves him that he feels this way. That's why he's trying so desperately to become friends with his dad again. And I think he'll make it. Know why? Because Jack's anger is based on love—and the way he feels about David, he can't stay mad at him forever. And between Jack's love and David's trying so hard to make up with him—they've got to be friends again before long."

"Besides," she continued, "if I didn't go to Valentino, I would have been at the mercy of some Budapest designer. Can you imagine the outcome?"

The rumors grew to a crescendo when, while in Rome, Liz had dinner with Aristotle Onassis. Mrs. Onassis was nowhere in the picture.

"This is all so foolish," Liz exclaimed. "My having to explain every little move. But at least it will stomp out all those ugly rumors. They hurt us so much!"

"My decorator, Liz Williams, was with me in Rome and saw Mr. Onassis by chance in the lobby of our hotel. We all went to dinner in a group."

"And while we're on the subject, let me add this: my much-publicized excursion to Rome took exactly one day. I was anxious to return to Richard in Budapest. If you think it is easy to do eight wardrobe tests plus makeup and hairstyle changes, you've got another think coming!" retorted Liz.
