him now, but it is still painful for Dave to recall them. And one of his most painful secrets is his stealing!

"I had a bike shop in my garage," David remembers, "I'd be walking home from school and I'd see a bike sitting there, and I'd rip it off and drive it home. I'd paint it or do something neat to it. I ended up returning a lot of them, but I must have caused those people a lot of grief."

Not everyone looked at a boy who stole bicycles from his school friends as being normal. Some people thought that there was, in David Cassidy, a boy with a serious problem. Part of the problem may have been the gap between David and his father, Jack Cassidy—a gap that David was aware of since his early childhood.

"I had a lot of rejection from my father when I was young," he remembers. "I never saw him after he divorced me and my mother. I wouldn't hear from him for a year."

It's hardly the picture that has been painted of David in articles in which he, Jack Cassidy, and Shirley Jones are being touted as TV's first and most wholesome performing family; but now that the lid is off the Jack Cassidy-Shirley Jones tottering marriage, David has let loose with a few insights into his past. If, as some have said, he seems to be closer with stepmom Shirley than with his natural father, it isn't surprising.

"I don't feel any hostility towards him," David explains of his father. "I'm a friend of his now. But a little boy shouldn't have been shunned like that."

David, as a youngster, may not have had all the attention he wanted from his father, but he looked for it elsewhere. In 1967, when he was sixteen, David headed off for San Francisco's Haight-Ashbury district to get a first-hand look at "flower people" and to do some experimenting with drugs.

His best friend, roommate, and merchandise manager, Sam Hyman, remembers those years. "At the end of the ninth grade," Sam recalls, "we started experimenting with drugs. David was never really sold on LSD, he didn't have that many good trips. He was more into hash. He always had more hash than anyone I knew."

David himself speaks about what it was like to live among the hippies. "I didn't know who I was," he remembers. "I did a lot of experimenting, not smack but grass and speed and psychedelics. I had some bad trips, tripping for kicks in the worst, most paranoid places.

"But I wasn't taking drugs seriously," he adds, "I didn't want to be a junkie. A few of my friends died, committed suicide actually."

In time, of course, David's convictions about the dangers of drugs became so strong that he taped numerous public service announcements on the subject, warning his fans to stay away from pot and pills. For David himself, though, a warning just wasn't enough. He needed more—time to get his head together and some help in sorting out his problems.

"I came down with mononucleosis and spent three months in the house. No socializing, no getting high—thinking. And I found out I cared a lot about myself. I wanted to achieve something, to do some-
