day will come when I have to decide about my future—and the people I want to be seen with."

And while he's deciding about the future, David's name will always be linked romantically with girls his advisers scoff are just friends. In most cases this is true. But David, a handsome, personable and wealthy young man, enjoys being seen with pretty girls. "They don't have to be starlets or in show business in any way," he explains. "They just have to be nice girls. The trouble is when I go out with one of them several times some people have us engaged. No way. I've dated the same girls quite a bit . . . but there is no such thing as marriage in my future as yet."

David has a natural rapport with his fans and he feels he will be the first to know when their interest in him is waning and they start to clamor after newer and younger stars.

When that time comes—as he is convinced it will in a few years—his plans are already made up. "I plan to get out of sight for a while . . . a year, two years, maybe three," he says. "By that time I hope that I will be just a memory as a teen idol. I probably will go to New York or some place like that to develop my acting. I may even go to Europe to do some films there. But when I return I hope I have mastered my craft and I hope that producers will consider me professional enough to use in all kinds of roles. I once told an interviewer I would probably never wind up in the unemployment lineup and I probably won't, unless I do something really foolish. But if I don't make it as a serious actor I don't want to go the route of some of the guys who were in my position years ago.

"I don't want to appear in cheap, hoked-up pictures because I still have something of a name the people will remember. I want good, solid roles and if I can't handle them, well, I don't know. That's something I'll face when I come to it.

"But I hope I never hear a kid whom I consider a fan now say at that time 'There goes David . . . what's his name? You know, he used to be a big singer.' That would be the end for me."
