

DAVID

career doesn't even leave him time for a leisurely sick-day now and then. But why does he drive himself like this?

The answer is Y-O-U! David realizes how much pleasure you get out of going to his concerts and watching him on TV. And he realizes that he has a responsibility to his fans to stay healthy and continue doing the good job he's doing. There have been many frustrating days when "I quit!" is on the tip of David's tongue, but he swallows it because he knows how much you'd miss him if he weren't around.

Is this the same David the girl was describing in the letter? Is this the David who doesn't care about his fans? Maybe she had better think again!

"When I hear girls moaning because they couldn't speak to me personally after a show or complaining because I couldn't answer their letter to me, I only wish I could explain things to them," says David. "In the first place I get an awful lot of mail and although it is all opened and read, if I had to sit down and answer every one of those letters, I'd never have time to rehearse for the show! I wish people would understand the demands on my time—I don't even have time to do the things that most people get to do in their day—like calling up an old buddy and rapping to him for an hour. So it isn't like I deliberately snub my fans. I just have to give myself to them in such a way that they can all share me—not just a select few!"

Well, what about shaking hands with fans after concerts or giving autographs? "Safety is a factor there," replies David. "Everybody has heard all kinds of horror stories about cars getting turned over and arms being broken and people being trampled on—all because of a crowd that got out of hand. I did a concert recently at Houston's Astrodome for 44,000 fans. What would happen if they all decided they wanted to come backstage afterwards? I'd still be in Texas, that's what!" David has to laugh at himself here, because no matter what, he still can't get over the way people still come from all over to hear him sing.

"I realize I have a responsibility to my fans—I wouldn't be anywhere without them and I recognize that," he says. "But everyone has to understand that I don't shun personal contact with my fans because I'm bored or stuck-up. I just have to spread myself very thin to do all the work I have to do in a day. I hope my fans can understand that."

What response can you give to that 15-year-old ex-fan? "I can only say 'I'm sorry' to people who think I've neglected them in some way," says David, "and I hope they'll understand that
