 want to play. There is so much to do and see and feel."

When he senses that his frustrations are too weighty, the pressures approaching the unbearable, he doesn't run to a psychiatrist or a saloon.

"By the end of a week," he admits, "I'm incredibly tense and pretty mean to be around. So I look for something physical to do, or I play the guitar. That's a lot cheaper than psychiatry." (Or drinking.)

"A human being is an incredibly complicated machine, who sometimes needs professional help. But I've never been to a psychiatrist. Maybe I'm too conservative. I have a tendency to believe that I should solve my own problems."

David emphasizes that he wants marriage while conceding that "it may be an outmoded institution." Nevertheless, he'd be willing to risk it again should the circumstances be right.

"But," he wonders, "are there circumstances when people would advise you to marry? It takes a long, long time to work out a relationship with a person—with any person. This applies in or out of marriage. And, in marriage, the circumstances are so intimate that. . . ."

"It's so easy now to have a sexual relationship without bearing any responsibility. Girls say, 'Yes,' as easily and as thoughtlessly as they used to say, 'No.' People haven't thought what such sexual permissiveness may be denying them. They enjoy the physical without thinking about what the substance of a relationship should be."

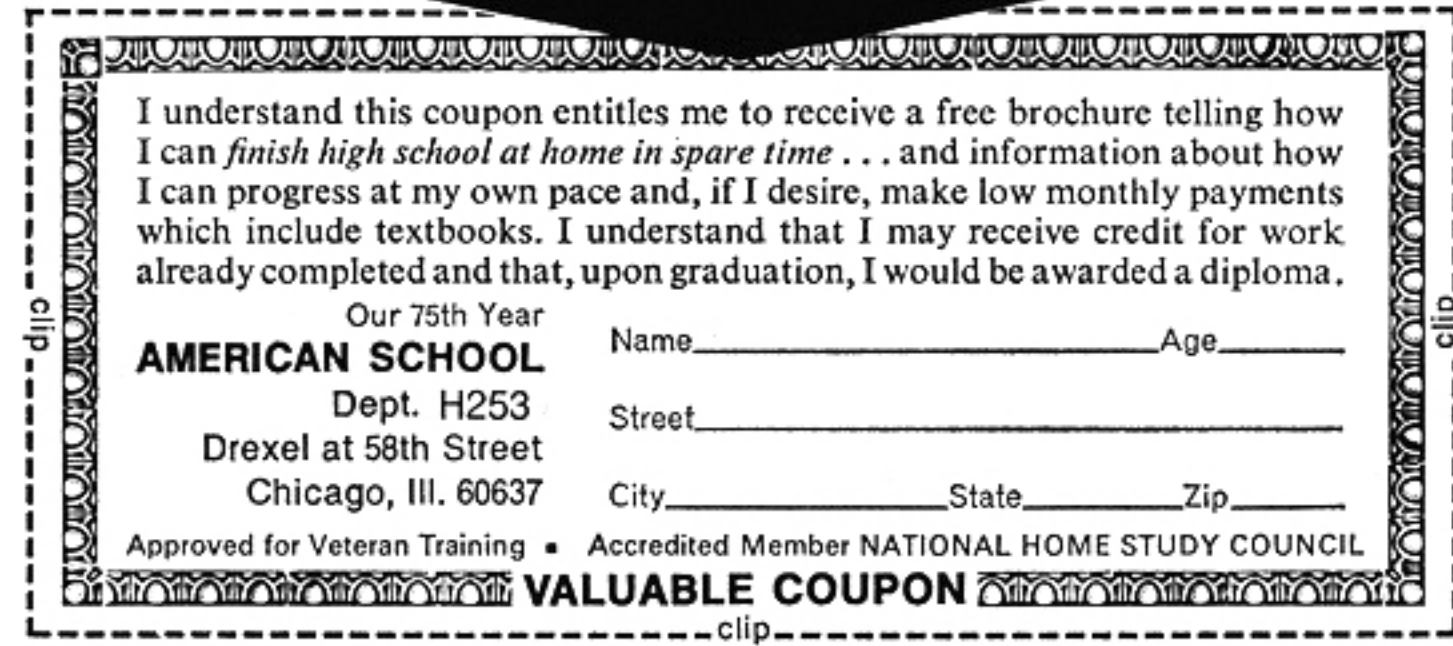

The failure of humans to value one another to the fullest inspires David to sorrow. To get without giving is, to him, unforgivable. Pressed for further information about his own relationships, he maintains his evasive cool.

"I really don't even date," he insists, "because I work such long hours. My work's very important to me, and I spend about 50 hours a week at it."

As for his feeling for Meredith, he will only say—after admitting that they are more than co-stars—"It's much easier to work with someone you know and trust."

Though David won't concede that he took Meredith away from David Cassidy, the fact is, she formerly dated the star of "The Partridge Family," and now she doesn't. On the other hand, her fondness for David Birney is obvious. Since she's known the disappointment of an unsatisfactory marriage, and is the mother of two, she's old and wise for her years. She's woman enough to be drawn to a responsible kind of relationship. David Birney is a mature, young actor of intelligence and charm. And if that isn't a winning combination, he also plays the guitar!
