

DAVID CASSIDY

help. Somehow the fans found out where he was living and began their constant vigil all over again. Of course, he didn't want to offend his fans. He loves them, but they just didn't seem to understand that David was just a normal young guy who wanted to live a normal life. He didn't really understand what all this stardom was about.

David had been exposed to show business all his life—his father is Jack Cassidy and his step-mother is his Partridge co-star Shirley Jones, but neither Jack nor Shirley had ever experienced the type of stardom that was now a part of David's life. They really couldn't offer him much advice, although his father told him that this popularity could last just for a fleeting moment and he should enjoy it while he could.

David wasn't exactly sure what that meant. All he knew was that he couldn't buy a pair of shoes, get a haircut or walk out of his own house without lots of uninvited company!

David has now moved two more times. Since he made his last move nobody has found him. But then again, more than two years have passed since David's name first became a household word and his picture on the fan magazines has moved from being the largest down to the number two spot. David's star was fading and he was beginning to realize it.

In the next group of interviews David gave, he was increasingly hostile toward those fans who'd been so devoted to him for the past two years. He called them juvenile and said he wanted respect and admiration from his contemporaries—other musicians and actors. David said he was "going to give up show business" if he couldn't get the people he admired to admire him. Sure he wanted to keep his fans, but at a distance. He wanted them to watch him on TV and buy his records, but he didn't want them inside and outside his house. He wanted to be able to walk down the street or go out on a date without feeling that he had to hide. If he couldn't have success his way, then he was tempted to just chuck it all and try to make his living some other way.

Supposedly David has mellowed in the last few months. Since his popularity is on the wane, he's become more tolerant and kinder toward his fans. He now realizes how very important they are to his career. He's showing respect for those girls who love him so very much and he's going to try giving them the very best entertainment he can. That's for now. What's in David Cassidy's future, well, perhaps only the stars know.
