even protracted girl chasing. He simply wants more time to work on his albums, maybe do a movie, or just be free to get involved in many different things. David has proven to everyone that his talents are multi-faceted; now he wants a chance to follow along on a versatile tide, not simply the straight-and-narrow-TV-series-road.

David knows that "The Partridge Family" brought him fame and fortune and faithful fans. But he also knows when you've gone as far as you can with a project, it's time to bow out and go on to the next choice. Creativity is the reason David is leaving the Partridges. He feels he has potential that he's not using and wants a chance to explore his talents.

David will definitely be leaving the Partridges when the new TV season is up. But you can count on seeing him more, not less, in his new role as a dramatic actor, an out-sight concert performer, and a guest entertainer on your fave shows. So David is hardly going out on a limb by fleeing the Partridge nest—he's just branching out!

harm, maybe even death.

That ill-fated tussle on the stage of the Las Vegas Hilton has resulted in a lot more than injured feelings all around. Those four men who rushed on to the stage that night have filed a $4,000,000.00 law suit against Elvis himself and the Las Vegas Hilton. The men, who are South American nationals living in Los Angeles, claim they only came up on stage to shake Elvis' hand and congratulate him on what they thought was a phenomenal performance. Elvis' side claims the men were there to injure the star, and, naturally, the hotel concurs.

Which side is telling the truth? Did the bodyguards act too hastily in their attack on the four mysterious men? Were the men armed, and if they were would Elvis' men have used weapons also?

These questions and whether or not the men are entitled to any or all of the 4 million dollars will have to be decided by a court of law. But over-zealous fans are hereby warned—don't try to get too close to your idol—danger could be waiting for you in the wings!
