

GO WATER-SKIING WITH DAVID CASSIDY

...for thrills and spills galore!

It's no great surprise to find that David Cassidy is fond of water-skiing because he's always said he loves the outdoor life. And there's nothing that could be more outdoor than water-skiing! All that racing through the air with the wind blowing in your face, not forgetting the frequent contact with the water!

David took up this hobby while staying with a good friend of his in Australia. Luckily enough this friend owns Sea World — a fish park. This is no ordinary park, though. One of its main attractions are dolphins, and huge crowds gather to watch them performing their tricks. I suppose if the crowds knew that David Cassidy was somewhere close by there'd be a fair size crowd wanting to see David!

Anyway, David hadn't come to watch the dolphins, although he's very fond of all sorts of animals. He was much more interested in a spot of water-skiing. His friend kindly lent him a boat and another friend volunteered to man the boat and tow David round. One thing about water-skiing — you do need the help of your friends and David has never been short of those!

So with a boat and pair of borrowed water-skis, — David never seems to have got round to getting his own, he's been so busy the last few years — he set off to enjoy himself. The day could not have been more perfect for skiing. There was just a light wind blowing and not a cloud in the sky. The sun wasn't too hot and the water was a deep blue colour as David set off.

At first David got the feel of his borrowed skis and was content to be towed around at a fairly sedate pace. After a while he began to feel more adventurous and decided to perform his favourite trick — skiing on only one ski. Believe it or not, he didn't fall in! The last time he had attempted this trick was in Miami and before that New Zealand.

As David continued to skim along on only one ski he got a little too adventurous and found himself swimming rather than skiing!

And after this mishap David wasn't quite so daring. He had been out on the water for just over an hour when he decided that he'd had enough. So the boat made its way back to the shore with David trailing along behind.

Water-skiing had proved thirsty work. So David and his friend had a couple of ice-cold drinks between them and went off to change. Altogether David had really enjoyed himself, and before he left the park he went to find his friend, the owner, and thank him.

When David left, the crowds were still enjoying the antics of the performing dolphins. Little did they know that not far away a superstar had also been enjoying himself. And they'd missed him completely!

Watch the elusive David Cassidy water-skiing in exclusive colour by just turning this page!