

HOW KAY LENZ WON DAVID'S HEART

Kay in two scenes from her exciting film "The Superman of the Wild West"

Don't they look happy, the two of them? David and Kay, the couple of the year, during their short visit to London.

It wasn't love at first sight, but rather at second glance: David Cassidy and Kay Lenz's first date wasn't exactly romantic. David felt ill and had to go home. But on their second date, the two got to know each other better and realized during their conversation that they had a lot in common: Like David, Kay is crazy about horses; she is a

Independent and self-reliant like David, both have successful careers in show business; and both are dog lovers: Kay is as fond of her dog Sadie, an Australian Shepherd, as David is of his Bullseye.

Kay owns her own house in Hollywood and, like David, drives a BMW. But the most important thing they have in common is that they love each other.

So who is this girl who stole David's heart?

Kay Lenz (24) was born in Los Angeles, but her German-sounding name is no coincidence: her father Ted is of German descent. Her parents are in show business, so it's no surprise that she first stood, or rather lay, in the spotlight at the tender age of eight weeks: as a baby for advertising shoots. As a teenager, things happened quickly: Kay appeared in hundreds of commercials and as a guest star in many children's and youth television shows in Hollywood.

At the age of 14, she took a five-year break from show business to complete her schooling. In 1972, she ventured a new start to her career. She landed a role in the Clint Eastwood film Breezy. This was followed by guest appearances in television films, for example as Raymond Burr's partner in "The Chief" and Paul Newman's partner in "Petrocelli." Her film "The Superman of the Wild West" will soon be available to watch here.