

WINNING rave reviews on his new American tour, Sir Paul McCartney, pictured, surprisingly sings nothing from his most recent album, 2020's acclaimed McCartney III. But he knows the fans prefer the old hits.

The 79-year-old explains: "I'd like to do a whole show of new songs but that's for the anoraks, the deep fans."

"Most people who come and see me want Beatles stuff mainly, or Wings stuff."

One previous concert crowd-pleaser has, however, been unceremoniously axed. Back In The USSR, naturally.

ONE person who has an army of fans to rival Macca's is the late singer and actor David Cassidy, even five years after his death.

Devoted admirers from all over the world, including the UK, funded the £16,300 for a paving stone on the Las Vegas Walk Of Stars, at the resort where he performed in the 1990s.

They also attended a weekend of memorial events to mark what would have been his 72nd birthday.
